

Abstract: This paper discusses the relationship between the development of the Chinese economy and the environment. It points out that the rapid economic growth in China has led to a significant increase in environmental pollution and resource depletion. The author argues that sustainable development is the only way to achieve long-term economic growth and social stability. The paper proposes several measures to improve the environmental quality, including strengthening environmental protection laws, promoting clean production, and increasing public awareness of environmental protection. The author also emphasizes the importance of international cooperation in addressing global environmental issues.